Aside from being a lighthouse keeper, Colm is also a talented artist. The flourish of his artwork reveals the history as it began between the Larkin and Sullivan families. The pictures are plaintive, expressing deep emotions on still-life of canvas. He painted multiple landscapes of the Irish boat docking in New York City in 1880, along with the lighthouse and keeper's cottage. A plentiful cache of personal images also emerge: Molly Larkin and Colm on a beach picnic; Molly and Colm in the throes of passion, their naked bodies glistening in firelight; Molly screaming in childbirth, straining herself in a bed to bring forth twins; Molly in her attic refuge, head bent in deep depression with a bottle of laudanum in her hand; Molly and Colm facing one another in the room atop the lighthouse; Molly throwing herself from the cliffs at Banshee Point, her skirts billowing after her; and the bare and stark image of Molly's headstone in the Larkin family cemetery. Colm envisioned incidents in his mind. He had knowledge of events, and painted each from memories of people involved. He took part in many of the occasions personally, but others he painted from imagination and recounts of the happenings. His art is a living history of his own family, the Larkin's and their wondrous estate, and brings his descendants full circle. Appears in The Advent and Quixotic Crossings.
